This Working Paper at a Glance

This Handbook presents profiles of European Employers' Organisations (EEOs). The profiles provide general information on each organisation and detail how EEOs represent their member interests in the areas of employment relations, work, labour, and social policy in the European Union. This representation includes lobbying activities, joint work and relationships with labour unions and participation in EU institutions. This Handbook is aimed at practitioners and academics with an interest in the activities and impacts of EEOs, including unionists, employer representatives, policy makers and researchers of European employment relations and European Union integration.

1. Introduction

This Handbook presents profiles of European Employers' Organisations (EEOs). The profiles provide general information on each organisation and detail how EEOs represent their member interests in the areas of employment relations, work, labour and social policy in the European Union. This representation includes lobbying activities, joint work and relationships with labour unions, and participation in EU institutions. This Handbook is aimed at practitioners and academics with an interest in the activities and impacts of EEOs, including unionists, employer representatives, policy makers and researchers of European employment relations and European Union integration.

From 2018 to 2020, our team at Cardiff Business School carried out the research project on the "Interest Representation of European Employer Organisations", funded by the Hans Böckler Foundation. A key aim of the project was to identify all EEOs that represent employer interests in the European Union. Previous research focussed on EEOs registered as social partners with the European Commission (Keller and Platzer 2003; Keller and Weber 2011; Degryse 2015). These EEOs are consulted in EU legislative processes on employment and social policy matters and participate with European unions in cross-sectoral and sectoral social dialogue. However, our research also identified and included additional EEOs, which were not registered as social partner organisations, but nonetheless represented employer interests in the areas of employment relations, work, labour and social policy. EEOs have been previously called the "hidden face of European employment relations" (Arcq, Dufresne and Pochet 2003), and thus our project aimed to capture the full range and extent of employer interest representation in the European Union and to move beyond a narrow focus on social dialogue.

The information provided in this Handbook are based on the Cardiff European Employers' Organisations Database, which our project compiled between 2018 and 2020. Our database included 136 EEO profiles of which 70 were registered as social partner organisations (European Commission 2019) and the remaining 66 EEOs represented employer interests without such an EU registration. We compiled data on each EEO covering governance, activities and service provision to members based on EEO websites, the European Transparency Register and EU websites and online archives. In addition, our research was informed by more than 100 interviews with primarily representatives of EEOs, but also by interviewees that interact with EEOs or have knowledge of them such as unionists, politicians, NGO staff and researchers. Further information on our research methods, in particular the selection criteria, are provided in appendix 4.

This Handbook might be used as a reference book. To enable easy access, we provide a list of all EEOs in appendix 1 and a breakdown of European Employers' Organisations by sector in appendix 2. This Handbook is published alongside the HBS Working Paper "What do European Employers' Organisations do?" (Aranea, Demougin, Goberman and Hauptmeier, 2021), which examines and maps the activities of EEOs and argues that EEOs represent their members through four roles: as lobbyist, reluctant social partner, service provider and standard setter.

Appendix 4: EEO Database, sampling criteria and data collection

We created an EEO Database containing the total EEO population as of 2019. The starting point for the database was the European Transparency Register, a list of EU-level interest groups. The Register lists organisations with access passes to the European Commission or the European Parliament and included almost 12,000 entries.

We then used four first-order sampling criteria to identify EEOs within this wider interest group population. First, organisations had to represent individual employers or their federations, as opposed to organisations representing workers, professionals, or civil society elements. Second, they needed members in at least two EU-member countries, unlike national EOs who represent employers in one country. We included global EOs that focussed primarily on Europe but excluded those that were truly global. Third, organisations had to charge membership fees to distinguish them from private lobby firms, think tanks and informal networks. Fourth, their pan-European activities had to include a focus on work and employment.

We used eight second-order criteria to test if an organisation met the fourth criterion of a focus on work and employment. A positive result against at least one second-order criteria was necessary for inclusion in the database. The second-order criteria were: (1) participation in European Social Dialogue (2) provision of policy papers within work and employment topics (3) provision of best practice guides or codes of conduct linked to work and employment (4) meetings with DG Employment high-level staff (5) offering training to members (6) participation in European Commission expert groups linked to work and employment (7) participation in European Parliament events linked to work and employment and (8) participation in a DG Employment Sector Skills Council.

First-order sampling criteria (any EEO must fulfil all four criteria)

1. Organisations had to represent federations of employers, employers themselves, or individuals acting as employers, so not mainly individual workers or professionals.
2. Their membership had to be pan-European as opposed to national, with members from at least two different EU-member countries.
3. Organisations had to charge membership fees, distinguishing them from private lobby firms or think tanks.
4. Organisations had to be active at EU level in the broad policy area of work and employment in representation of their members' labour market interests, as opposed to a representation of their product market interests.

Second-order sampling criteria (any EEOs must fulfil at least one criterion)

1. Participation in European Social Dialogue

8. Participation in a DG Employment Sector Skills Council

Our final database contained 136 EEOs. We populated the database with data on each EEO across their organisational features, activities, and links with other organisations. Our main sources were EEOs' organisational websites and EU archival records. We searched EEO websites for activities in the policy area of work and employment, including position papers, projects, or codes of conduct. Other relevant activities were the provision of services such as training, and media releases or campaigns on labour topics. EEO websites also provided information on organisational characteristics such as main office location, legal form, and links with other organisations. We complemented and verified these data with those from the Commission and Parliament's archival records. These further data allowed us to include EEOs' participation in relevant European Commission expert groups, meetings with DG Employment staff, European Sector Skills Councils, the EU Alliance for Apprenticeships, or European Parliament hearings.

We triangulated findings from our EEO database with qualitative interview data. We carried out more than 100 semi-structured interviews between 2018 and 2020. Most were carried out in person in Brussels, although some were conducted via telephone (during the Covid-19 pandemic). We selected EEO representatives who were either policy experts in their respective organisation or leading their organisation as director or secretary general. Interview questions focused on the employment policy issues of interest to the EEOs, forms of interest-representation, and working relations with other organisations representing labour or employers. In addition, we interviewed actors that have a knowledge of or regularly interact with EEOs such as European labour union federations, national employer associations, consultancies, and researchers in Brussels.

The research methods used and applied in this EEO project, such as the database methodology, were based on and developed in a previous research project on UK employers' organisations (Gooberman, Hauptmeier and Heery 2020a/b, 2019a/b, 2018; Demougin et al. 2019; Demougin, Gooberman and Hauptmeier 2019; Bowkett, Hauptmeier and Heery 2017; Heery, Gooberman and Hauptmeier 2017; Gooberman and Hauptmeier 2018).
